OLD CALIFORNIA MISSIONS.

tion at the old mission of San Carlos de Monterey commemorates, one must visit the places in whice he labored and see the natural obstacles which his genius and enthusiasm over-came. His story is virtually the story of the founding of the Franciscan missions in Califorms—a narrative of hardship and privation suffered for the cause of religion, unsurpassed in the history of the Catholic Church. No one can write other than a colorless narrative of his career who has failed to see this California coast country in the desolate dry season.

turn himfrom his great purpose of evangeliz-ing the California Indians. Palon, one of his associates, who has left about the only trustworthy materials for a biography, records the rapture of Serra when he was able to baptize Indian child, and thus save a soul from a now exertion, and the ploration of a savage land, so barren was the ploration of a savage land, so barren was the country, so destitute of water, so overgrown with the giant cactus which in many places grew so thick that a roadway had to be lowed through it. After nearly two months of hardships, the band reached San Diege and founded there the first of the Franciscan missions, on the corrupt rule of Governor Pion Manual Consisted which wought such wonders in the previous half century was lost. Finally in March, the corrupt rule of Governor Pion Palama Dairy For Salf party of these eager proselyters set out for Monterey to found a mission on the beautiful bay which Viscayne had discovered nearly two centuries before. They made their toil-some way up along the barron coast, receiving many presents of acorns from the Indians. They passed by the object of their search, toded over leagues of sand and made their way through miles of chapparal, until at last they reached the bay of San Francisco. It was only on a second expedition that Montercy was found. Then the land and sea expeditions united in the consecration of the spot, and a large cross was put up on the shore, which has been repeated with those core and will market

The years that followed until Serra's death in 1781, were years of constant work in founding new missions, of frequent conflicts with the military authorities, and of no small perplexities is keeping under control the large bodies of Indian neophytes at the different missions. So much work was needed to develop the new stations that no effort could be recently bestowed upon the Heir-Apparent to the Busian Crown, has, since its foundations. After starting a mission, the Indians were instructed in the raising of grain, means of irrigation were devised, fruit-trees were planted, and temporary structures for residence and worship were creeted. The pioneer labor was very heavy and in this rough work Father Serra, who was made Prosident of the missions, took a hand, not disdaining to make adobe with the Indians, or to clear away the chapmanal Serra, who was made I considered to the contraction took a hand, not disdaining to make adobe with the Indians, or to clear away the chapparal for the crops. Before his death nine missions were founded, as follows: San Diego Monterey, San Antonio de Padua, San Diego Monterey, San Antonio de Padua, San Gabriel, San Luis Obispo, San Francisco, San Juan Capistrano, Santa Clara, San Bonaventura. With two exceptions these missions now mark the after of cities and large towns, and give to the sale of cities and large towns, and give to the sale of cities and large towns, and give to the lavish expenditure, the Prince went for study and licalth and recreation, and his august we exceptions these missions now mark the site of cities and large towns, and give to the geography of California the sonorous Spanish element so pleasing in comparison with the rude Indian names of Oregon and Washington Territory or the profane titles bestowed by the early miner and adventurer. Of all these mis-sions, that established on the banks of the Carsions, that established on the banks of the Car-mel river, four miles from Monterey was the favorite of Padre Sorra. That he made his headquarters and to that he returned after his periodical visits to the elater missions which The eyes of Serra never saw the many beau tiful churches in which the devotion of the Franciscans incarnated. He died at the Carmel mission, August 28, 1781, and his funeral was the scene of great lamentation among the In-dians who regarded him as a father.

of Serra's character there have been various estimates, but nearly all the historians have agreed in awarding him the zeal of a locycla without his cruelty. The world to him was a buttlefield; he walked among types of evil and of good, like Bunyan's Pilgrim; even his crdinary banness letters are currously interlarded with scraps of exhortation and appeals for divine guidance. Though of slight frame, and suffering much from bodily weakness, he never failed to cerollect the long service of the church, and in his sermons it was his practice to beat his breast with a store in order to impress his hearers with the suffering which awaited the allowed to go without healing, accepting it, with the false monastic idea of that age, as a cross which was put upon him. The records of the time show that he enjoyed the sweets of power, and while very tender and considerate of the converts, he could be harm and dietatorial with the military, whom he regarded as intraders upon his territory. His dream was to organize all the missions on the coast under intruders upon his territory. His dream was to organize all the missions on the coast unde one spiritual head, and to have no secular in terference. The fair new territory he bel-and been earned by the Franciscans, and t them it should be given to rule as the Jesuita had ruled in Mexico a century before. Hence be curbed the power of the military whenever be curbed the power of the military whenever it was practicable, and aroused that strong spirit of antagonism to the missions which bere fruit in later years in their rapid decline and final ruin. He was a severe disciplinarian, and expected of priests, scophytes and Indian converts the same passiouate devolion to religion which he showed in his every day life. There are many stories of his severity in enforcing discipline, and in convention the conjudge him harshly. Naturally averse, like any savage people to continued effort, Serra and his associates thought them the arts of building and agriculture. The Indians were assured of a good living, even in the long dry assured of a good aving, even in the long dry

Junipero Serra, which the centenary celebraas of the Golden Age of their people. WHAT LED TO DECAY.

The history of the missions after Serra's death may be condensed into a paragraph. For twenty years the missions grew with great rapidity. By 1801 nineteen missions in all were established, in which were gathered 20,000 Indians. The Indians formed villages about the mission buildings. They were allotted land, but unfortunately for them, they received no grant of this land, nothing by which they could prove ownership, or any legal title. To this wild country inhabited only by scattered tribes of Indians, came the Padre Juni-pero Surra and a small body of his followers civil and military authorities looked lustfully pero Serra and a small body of his followers from Mexico. They had been sent by the Franciscans to take possession of the country in the franciscans to take possession of the country from which an imperial edict had elected the Jesuits. Serra had had a hard noviciate in Mexico, preaching and founding missions for mearly twenty years. He was in the prime of life; full of enthusiasm for the salvation of the souls of the heather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of the salvation of the souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of that simple souls of the beather; full too, of the salvation of the souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the succession of the simple souls of the beather; full too, of the simple souls of the si inquestioning faith which has almost coased the missions secularized and placed under o exist in any church to-day; a man of iron control of the civil authorities. After the missions had been stripped of nearly all their lands and herds, a decision was passed by the United States Land Commis-sioner, restoring the church buildings and the remunits of land to the Catholic Church. But they are now only sad reminders of their former wealth and giery; the chirches in ruin and decay and the lands worked by some humble retainers of the once powerful mission.—N.
